Introduction and Context

Over the past several months, the ArtsEd Response Collective (ARC) convened stakeholders across the arts education sector to understand the challenges and priority areas that emerged as a result of the COVID-19 pandemic and were compounded by systematic and ongoing violence against Black communities. These challenges have been acutely felt and experienced by the entirety of Chicago's arts education community.

Amidst these challenges, the nation’s third-largest school district is preparing to begin the 2020-2021 school year remotely. Schools are delicately balancing factors such as staffing models, capital and/or space considerations, communications, technology infrastructure, and resource flexibility and allocation. Similarly, over 500 arts partners and their teaching artists, staff, and audiences are preparing their programming in this same landscape. Arts partner organizations are balancing factors of diminished staffing and revenues with restarting artistic and arts education programming. The capacity needed to adapt programs, establish health and hygiene practices, prepare staff and teaching artists, navigate CPS operations, and build necessary technology capacity is significant.

The Department of Arts Education and Ingenuity continue to work together alongside schools and partners to support the sector in this difficult time. The release of both this ARC Final Report and the CPS Department of Arts Education’s Arts Education Remote Guidance, authored in parallel, provide vision, direction, and tangible recommendations for how to navigate our collective next steps together. To better connect the two documents, ARC’s Leading Actions sections include links to specific portions of the CPS Arts Education Remote Guidance Resources that will be most applicable to arts partners’ work.
Our Assets

Fortunately, Chicago’s schools benefit from arts opportunities and assets that are unprecedented in recent history. These hold promise to sustain the role of the arts inside the public school system despite challenges and change. These assets include:

- A large, established, and well-integrated Department of Arts Education with powerful plans for arts education quality, grade-appropriate standards-based arts instruction, meaningful and strategic partnerships, and plans to fuel the teacher pipeline for those schools that are without certified and endorsed arts instructors;
- Significant arts-supportive policies, backed by leadership, that continue to uphold arts as core to a well-rounded curriculum, protect and promote the position of the arts within the school day, and hold to the benchmarks set by the Master Arts Education Plan established in 2012 – including at least 120 minutes of arts instruction weekly for every elementary student, and robust arts disciplines and depth at the high school level;
- Near full participation in the Creative Schools Certification survey across every type of school in the district – and wide adoption and utilization of Ingenuity supports, resources, and tools;
- Highly arts-supportive Mayoral leadership, with meaningful investments in the Creative Schools Fund (CSF) for the third year in a row, crisis relief for artists and arts organizations through the pandemic, and arts and culture priorities that emphasize arts education as central;
- A culturally-vibrant arts and culture community that provides arts experiences to CPS students both in and outside of the classroom, which has shown great versatility through the recent school closures;
- Responsive, organized, collaborative, and thoughtful philanthropic leadership; and
- Collectively created Values of Quality in arts education that resonate with local and national concerns and priorities across the sector.
Our Call to Action

As the Department of Arts Education and their CPS peers advance critical infrastructure from within the school system, and the Mayor’s Office implements arts and culture priorities, it is incumbent on those who work in partnership with those entities to redouble efforts to sustain our shared vision - arts education equity for every student, in every grade, in every school. We must sustain this vision within a changing landscape, one which now calls on all of us to 1) embrace new thresholds for flexibility and adaptation, 2) leverage our collective knowledge to respond to emerging needs and assets across the sector, and 3) re-evaluate our role in relation to privilege and power.

While the ArtsEd Response Collaborative (ARC) was formed to address the immediate challenges of COVID-19, the police murders of George Floyd, Breonna Taylor, and Tony McDade and shooting of Jacob Blake amplified disparities rooted in systemic racism that were already apparent through the pandemic. This cumulative national trauma and mobilization to protest injustice are interwoven with the arts sector’s collective responsibility to critically examine the role we play in creating or maintaining systems that drive inequity. Thus, in addition to planning for a school year that will undoubtedly require ongoing flexibility through change, and leveraging our collective assets and knowledge to meet students where they are, we must also evaluate our vision in a new light, questioning whether arts equity can be sustained in a world in which racial equity is still out of reach. This interrogation leads us to a new vision - one which expands how arts equity is conducted, evaluated, and achieved.
Our Process

Anticipating the significant impacts of COVID-19 on the arts education sector in Chicago, in addition to acts of social injustice, police brutality against Black people and economic crisis, Ingenuity began to convene a collective response at the end of March 2020 to ensure that none of the hard-fought arts education gains made in CPS were lost. Our goal was aimed at addressing this changing landscape and laying forward a sustainable path for arts education in the future.

Ingenuity first assembled an ARC Advisory Committee composed of representatives and leaders from across the sector to advance initiatives that mitigate the impacts of COVID-19 on our community. Next, Ingenuity hosted a number of virtual convenings with arts partners, CPS teachers, CPS students, CPS principals, CPS Network Chiefs, philanthropic leaders, and others to ensure we proactively heard about challenges on the ground. Participants from across Chicago’s arts and education sectors shared their experiences and feedback over the course of virtual convenings to help inform ArtsEd Response Collective strategies. Themes quickly emerged from the conversations. After conversations, working group feedback sessions provided an opportunity to refine identified areas of need and begin to establish priorities for actions. All of this work has led to this report.
Guiding Vision and Leading Actions

The guiding vision and leading actions in the ARC Final Report articulate how arts organizations, philanthropy, and Ingenuity as a sector service organization must all recommit to our vision, but recontextualize it in a new landscape.

Shared Guiding Vision

Every student, in every grade, in every school, has access to the arts as part of a well-rounded education.
Leading Action One

Exercise radical flexibility to build, sustain, and protect arts education access.

The themes shared from sector stakeholders indicated that those who successfully adapted to rapidly changing circumstances - and prepared for ongoing changes ahead - were often most poised to maintain relationships, creative partnerships, organizational sustainability, and the core work of arts education through crisis. There is much to suggest that the next 1-2 years will require ongoing adaptation if the work of arts education is to continue in such a rapidly evolving future state:

School Reopening Models: After receiving significant feedback from families and teachers, Chicago Public Schools announced a fully remote first quarter. However, ‘surges’ and waves of virus spread through the fall and winter may result in ongoing changes to instructional formats throughout the year. Those in the arts education sector will have to engage in contingency planning for a number of schooling models, as well as prepare to act quickly to ongoing shifts in the educational landscape.

Health and Safety Protocols: As the science base around COVID-19 builds, health and safety protocols will also evolve. How can dance instruction adapt to remote learning platforms? How will theater rehearsals work in the context of mask requirements? What does improv look like in a physically-distancing format? Where will students sing in winter? These changes will likely be accompanied by changing policies at the district, city, and state levels that will have impacts on students and schools, including in the arts. Creativity and innovation will have to drive how the arts continue to happen at all in this new health landscape - and better yet, how they evolve to become something new.
To commit to embracing radical flexibility, we must:

1. Challenge and change our ideas about how things were ‘before’ - abandon waiting for a return to ‘normal.’ Understand that any future we will build as a sector is one that is created anew, built by its current participants, and shaped in accordance with the ideals we hold now;
2. Acknowledge that experimentation is now a part of the new operating norms for every industry - as public and private leaders, nonprofit boards, philanthropic supporters, and artists, we have to raise our threshold for risk, support and celebrate failure, share best practices, and commit to a higher degree of potential loss in order to continue important work in an uncertain landscape;
3. Strike a delicate balance between careful planning for many possible scenarios - and quick pivots and creative thinking as those scenarios change;
4. Commit to strategic collaboration to leverage and amplify diminished field-wide assets and find new economies of scale; and
5. Conduct financial planning that prepares for several potential scenarios, and identifies areas of risk due to high reliance on single sources (e.g., earned revenue from arts instruction or performances that can only be delivered in person).

Recommendations by Stakeholder Group

This section of the report provides stakeholder-specific actions and identifies ways in which the sector can track and measure growth and/or progress towards accomplishing the actions. Individual organizations may wish to develop unique measures of growth and progress stemming from these recommended actions as well. Additionally, guiding questions have been added to help each stakeholder group begin to unpack the actions and work in collaboration with their colleagues to explore and discuss.

It’s important to note that no organization will be able to do every action all at once, especially given the current capacity challenges of the sector. However, it is recommended that organizations identify the key actions they would like to work towards first, and commit to accomplishing them with intention and discipline.

Related CPS Arts Education Remote Guidance

The CPS Department of Arts Education has released Remote Arts Education Guidance. While primarily a tool for internal CPS teachers and school leaders, there are several sections and areas in which partners may find additional operational information and virtual instruction supports and resources. Linked below are specific areas that align to ARC Leading Action One.

- Remote Arts Partnerships

- Expectations for Remote Learning in the Arts #3: Reimagine Arts-specific Events
- Synchronous Learning in the Arts #1: Establish Norms for Synchronous Learning

- Synchronous Learning in the Arts #3: Establish Effective Synchronous Instruction
Leading Action Two

To respond to emerging needs and assets during a time of great change, prioritize knowledge sharing and professional learning.

Through the crisis, participants in the ARC sessions spoke about long-term relationships between schools and arts organizations that enabled ongoing communities of practice to thrive through the school closures and pandemic, and new models of remote learning to emerge. Yet there was also shared anxiety around how we prepare educators for the needs of students in the coming years, especially as the disparities in the impact of the pandemic on communities across the city came into focus.

Meeting the training needs of this community of educators from a place of connectivity, rather than as “check-boxes,” one-and-done conversations, or mere calendar commitments, is key to preparing educators for the work of supporting students through school re-start, further transitions and changes, and expected ongoing effects from COVID-19.

Professional learning and connection can provide valuable, immediate, and actionable resources and tools. But when we get distracted or deprioritize learning opportunities as adults, we subsequently deprioritize the learning of students.

The next 1-2 years will require ongoing knowledge sharing and professional learning if the work of arts education is to be sustained in such a rapidly evolving future state:
• Tailoring and customizing professional learning programs for a changing landscape and changing needs of students, teachers, schools, and organizations.
• Assessment of gaps in sector knowledge and needs.
• Supports and resources for connection, collaboration, and professional learning opportunities.

To commit to knowledge sharing and professional learning, we must:

1. Fully explore the ways in which arts can be a tool for recovery from crisis - whether as a healing practice, an avenue to reconnect after separation, a spark for protest and change, or an antidote to the challenges students, teachers, and schools have faced in the first half of 2020;
2. Universally embrace trauma-informed practice and an equity mindset in our teaching practices and work so we are ready to meet students where they are today;
3. Engage in communities of practice that will build a growing, open-source knowledge base around new ways of learning, emerging student assets and needs, and innovative ways to tailor and customize arts education within this new landscape; and
4. Commit to authentic learning practices that will result in true development as professionals, and change our practice:
   a. Be open, honest, and vulnerable in the learning process - only then can we evolve our practice to meet the current moment;
   b. Commit to actually changing practice based on our learning through continual reflection, applied learning, and continuous quality improvement; and
   c. Show up for learning - even in a virtual space. We learn from and with each other and need to leverage the collective knowledge of the community in order to build a broader base of understanding and responsiveness.

The CPS Department of Arts Education has released Remote Arts Education Guidance. Linked below are specific areas that align to ARC Leading Action Two.

- Instructional Priorities in Dance
- Instructional Priorities in Media Arts
- Instructional Priorities in Music
- Instructional Priorities in Theatre
- Instructional Priorities in Visual Arts
Leading Action Three

Deepen and broaden our commitment to equity to more explicitly include racial justice, economic parity, and human dignity.

It will take all of us to fix the societal failures preventing racial equity. We must all do the collective work of holding ourselves accountable for thoughtfully pursuing policies and implementing programs that are designed to achieve those ends. Each organization must examine and change internal operations and policies, programs, and outward-facing activities if our arts education community is to be truly equitable and anti-racist.

Reminding ourselves of the ‘equity equation,’ Access + Quality = Equity, provides us a chance to recommit ourselves to understanding and making explicit how this formula can help all organizations pursue racial equity, economic parity, and human dignity. It remains a useful framework for all stakeholders in the sector to play a role within their sphere of influence in driving changes in equity through improvements in quality.

The events of 2020 laid bare the ways in which former strategies to advance equity have fallen short - and disproportionately left Black and Brown people behind. 2020 has asked us to consider - if the progress we made was truly equitable, then how is it so easily undone? Can we build a more equitable future that is also sustainable?

We believe that we can build a more equitable and sustainable future if we commit to a definition of equitable arts access that explicitly broadens how we view our work:

- Equity cannot be considered accomplished unless it is accomplished in the broadest sense of the term - arts education access must be paired with racial equity, economic parity, and human dignity.
This means more than evaluating the extent to which arts education access has been achieved through demographic analyses. It means that the movements for racial justice, economic parity, and human dignity must be bound together with the work of the arts and of arts education. The impact of these movements on the students of Chicago Public Schools intersects profoundly with the work of arts education and artistic expression and must not be viewed as separate. Conducting the work of arts education with an explicit understanding of these intersections must become the ‘new normal’ if we are to advance our vision with integrity.

It also means that we must deepen our commitment to equity as a work-in-progress for ourselves and the institutions we lead, serve, and create:

- Building an equitable future requires us to closely examine the individuals, institutions, and systems that make up our sector - and hold ourselves and each other accountable to a more actively just future.
- We must engage in the difficult work of dismantling injustice in our organizations, institutions, and systems.
- We must dismantle the structures within us that fail to recognize how our systems and institutions benefit some at the expense of others - and confuse privileges with earned rights in our thoughts, words, and deeds.

To commit to racial justice, economic parity, and human dignity, we must:

1. Understand exactly where we stand in the work of eliminating racism, within our organizations, schools, and districts - and outside of them, in order to effectively partner in the work of arts education equity;
2. Commit to economic parity in our organizational structures, human infrastructure and policies, and teaching practices;
3. Join together in the movement for human dignity, prioritizing student agency, powering student-led change, and placing student voice as an important and key driver of our work;
4. Interrogate our own capacity to meaningfully meet the needs of the communities with which we work; evaluate how we enter into community partnership, what we can authentically do, in a high-quality way, and with whom - and identify anything that falls outside of those parameters as needing different models, partners, or capabilities from us;
5. Actively leverage data to drive decision-making, including how resources are allocated, partnerships are formed, and equity is achieved - eliminating bias as a factor and relying on continuous-objective data sources to shape understanding; and
6. Continue to close the gap on access to arts education for every student in every grade - but to do so with an explicit understanding of the intersections with racial justice, economic parity, and human dignity.
Recommendations by Stakeholder Group

This section of the report provides stakeholder-specific actions and identifies ways in which the sector can track and measure growth and/or progress towards accomplishing the actions. Individual organizations may wish to develop unique measures of growth and progress stemming from these recommended actions as well. Additionally, guiding questions have been added to help each stakeholder group begin to unpack the actions and work in collaboration with their colleagues to explore and discuss.

It’s important to note that no organization will be able to do every action all at once, especially given the current capacity challenges of the sector. However, it is recommended that organizations identify the key actions they would like to work towards first, and commit to accomplishing them with intention and discipline.

Organizational Practices: Are your funding guidelines and practices aimed at removing barriers or prioritizing funds for BIPOC organizations?

Organizational Practices: Is your foundation/organization committed to undoing racism and economic disparities in programs, policies, communications, and operations? What steps are being taken to ensure progress? How will the foundation/organization continually check for disparate impact and work to hold itself accountable to operating in ways that support human dignity for all?

Organizational Practices: How do you eliminate implicit bias in decision-making, examining grants allocation for economic parity, supporting BIPOC program officers, and staff members?

Organizational Practices: How do you examine the structures of philanthropy and its origins critically as you create grant-making practices?

Organizational Practices: How does your foundation/organization address economic parity through its programs?

Community Feedback: How are you gathering info, listening, and responding to grantees' needs?

Student Voice: Do you include student voice as a factor in determining grant decisions?

Sector Leadership: How can you support BIPOC leaders even if their work doesn’t always align with your priorities and strategies? How can you invest in BIPOC leaders at all levels of an organization?

Ingenuity

Data: What data do you need to help you identify schools and arts partners with the highest need?

Programs: Do your programs explicitly support BIPOC organizations and arts education administrators? How do you demonstrate it?

Programs: Are your programs aimed at removing barriers or prioritizing funds for BIPOC organizations?

Organizational Practices: Are you committed to undoing racism and economic disparities in programs, policies, communications, and operations? What steps are being taken to ensure progress? How will the organization continually check for disparate impact and work to hold itself accountable?

Organizational Practices: How do you address economic parity through your program approaches, external communications, and practices?

Community Feedback: How are you gathering info, listening, and responding to sector needs?

Student Voice: Do you include student voice as a factor in determining CSF grant decisions?

Learning: Do you have professional learning plans in place for all members of your team? How are you ensuring key organizational decision-makers also participate in training? How do you use supervision structures to link training concepts to ongoing practice and conduct job-embedded professional development?
Related CPS Arts Education Remote Guidance

The CPS Department of Arts Education has released Remote Arts Education Guidance. While primarily a tool for internal CPS teachers and school leaders, there are several sections and areas in which partners may find additional operational information and virtual instruction supports and resources. Linked below are specific areas that align to ARC Leading Action Three.

- Expectations for Remote Learning in the Arts #1: Consider Equitable Access to Arts Supplies and Equipment
- Instructional Priority #4 in Dance: Increase the relevance of instruction
- Instructional Priority #4 in Media Arts: Increase the relevance of instruction
- Instructional Priority #4 in Music: Increase the relevance of instruction

Next Steps

Ingenuity will continue to convene the arts education sector throughout the next school year, especially as continued uncertainty is expected. We are already hard at work in implementing several of the recommendations through development of new metrics on artlook® Map to help arts organizations, philanthropy, and CPS track our progress. Additionally, Ingenuity is creating professional learning offerings, identifying advocacy opportunities, and targeting new supports to ensure our guiding vision is realized. Please continue to visit our ArtsEd Response Collective webpage for updates, and follow Ingenuity on Facebook and Twitter where we frequently share important in-the-moment announcements.

The work of the ArtsEd Response Collaborative is far from over. Together, we must hold each other accountable for implementing and demonstrating progress on the leading actions of this plan: 1) embracing new thresholds for flexibility and adaptation; 2) leveraging our collective knowledge to respond to emerging needs and assets across the sector; and 3) re-evaluating our role in relation to privilege and power to ensure arts education equity for every student, in every grade, in every school.
